MUSIC Fans, collectors invited to Who documentary

The Who is looking for a who's-who of fans, even those whose hidden cameras captured brawls, high jinks and uncouth behavior. Devotees who have anecdotes, memorabilia, photos or video footage (procured legally or otherwise) are being sought to spice up an official documentary due in 2006. Surviving members Roger Daltrey and Pete Townshend are dipping into private archives for the film, tentatively titled My Generation: Who's Still Who, which the pair is co-producing with Spitfire Pictures, Trinifold Management and Oscar-winning director Murray Lerner. Lerner, who first filmed The Who at the Isle of Wight festival in 1970, plans to chronicle the band's unvarnished odyssey, including the infighting, rowdy off-stage escapades, splits, reunions and deaths of drummer Keith Moon and bassist John Entwistle. The director hopes to draw upon the resources of The Who's rabid fans and collectors, who are invited to contact him through www.thewhomovie.com.

Bridges enters Sci Fi's 'Stargate'

Beau Bridges' latest TV series, Sci Fi Channel's popular Stargate SG-1, is light-years more advanced than his first science-fiction project, 1965's Village of the Giants, with a young Ron Howard.

"I ate some goo and grew to be about 30 feet tall. It was real cheesy," Bridges says.

Not so Stargate SG-1, which starts its ninth season July 15 (8 p.m. ET/PT).

"This is one of the biggest sci-fi shows, so I feel really blessed," says Bridges.

Bridges plays Gen. Hank Landry, a Vietnam War fighter pilot who takes over as head of Stargate Command. The Stargates allow for split-second intergalactic travel.

"I'm in charge of the Stargate. Ben (Browder) goes out and does the dirty work," Bridges says of his co-star, who will play Lt. Col. Cameron Mitchell.

Bridges and Browder take over for Richard Dean Anderson, who left as a regular last season but will reappear. Actors Samantha Carter, Michael Shanks and Christopher Judge return. Louis Gossett Jr. joins the cast as an alien leader who competes with Teal'c (Judge) to control a new Jaffa nation.

New Jack City, the 1991 hip-hop gangster film that propelled the careers of Wesley Snipes, Chris Rock and Ice-T, is coming to DVD in a tricked-out, two-disc edition Aug. 23 ($27).

"It's a touchstone for both the African-American community and people into hip-hop," says Warner Home Video's Mike Radiloff.
